1.1 Introduction

Astrology, trends, prediction markets, and polls are all indicating a potential Trump victory, yet the mainstream media is painting a different picture, suggesting that Kamala Harris is likely to win. Why is there such a stark contrast? We'll explore this question today and consider what these conflicting narratives might mean for the post-election period. This discussion is particularly timely as we approach the final major astrological aspect of 2024—the Mars-Pluto opposition—set to occur on November 3 (Figure 1).

This situation highlights a "tale of two elections," where mainstream media reports stand in stark contrast to analyses from independent pollsters and alternative analysts. What is really going on beneath the surface of these conflicting stories? We'll delve into the discrepancies between these narratives to uncover the underlying forces shaping public perception.

1.2 Mars-Pluto Opposition

The Mars-Pluto opposition will influence not only the upcoming election but also the first half of November until Pluto moves into Aquarius on November 19 (Figure 2). This astrological event, combined with the lingering effects of the recent eclipse during a Fourth Turning year, suggests that deep, archetypal forces are at play.

The eclipse's impact on this election may intensify power struggles, as underlying energies from both the eclipse and the Mars-Pluto aspect bring heightened tension and transformative conflict to the surface.

Mars-Pluto aspects often signify power struggles and conflicts, transformative crises, heightened survival instincts, and deep polarization. In the context of this election, these forces could manifest as intense campaign tactics, power plays, potential unrest, and protests. Additionally, the Mars-Pluto dynamic can expose hidden power struggles and motivate change, leading to a more intense atmosphere in media and communication. We're likely to see strong efforts to control the narrative, with some media outlets going dark or adopting a negative tone, as both sides attempt to shape public perception.

There's a growing sense of public outrage and a feeling that some voices are intimidated or pressured in the voting process. We may witness concealed power dynamics emerging as Election Day nears, with both sides navigating tense and complex strategies. For example, Trump's team may consider drastic moves if they feel it's essential, such as targeting Kamala Harris's history prior to becoming Senator to sway public opinion. While certain extreme narratives may begin to wane, Mars-Pluto's intensity could still darken the campaign atmosphere.

As some have noted, we seem to be entering a "United States of Insanity," where political loyalties and betrayals defy belief. According to commentator Bret Weinstein, "The blue team is protected by the sheer audacity of their betrayal of Americans," pointing to a divide so profound that many struggle to comprehend it. This election season may lay bare these divides and confront us with difficult truths about power and the shifting landscape of American politics.

2.1 The Effect of the Eclipse

The October 2, 2024, annular "ring of fire" solar eclipse has a three-month period of influence, which will extend to December when the electoral voters meet (Figure 3). This eclipse, with its mundane or worldly effects, can bring unexpected events and unforeseen shifts. One notable example is the recent aftermath of Hurricane Helene, where the Biden administration faced criticism for failing to provide adequate support to Americans while allocating billions to Ukraine. This incident has brought about a mix of frustration and scrutiny.

In response to the hurricane's devastation, Kamala Harris recently visited Georgia, offering $750 per household in FEMA relief—a gesture intended to boost her standing in key states like Georgia, Pennsylvania, and North Carolina. However, this response has backfired to some extent, with public dissatisfaction affecting her poll numbers in these crucial swing states. For Trump, however, the influence of the eclipse appears to be shifting public sentiment in his favor as he gains ground in the polls. This unexpected outcome underscores how the eclipse may be impacting the dynamics of the election, extending into December when the electoral college voters meet.

2.2 The Pluto Return and the Eclipse

Another crucial factor shaping the current landscape is the U.S. Pluto return, coinciding with the "third act" of America's Fourth Turning crisis. On November 19, Pluto will re-enter Aquarius, overlapping with the final stages of the U.S.'s first Pluto return.

These converging cycles symbolize a period of intense change, societal transformation, and the potential for significant upheaval. This third act of the Fourth Turning crisis may bring hidden issues and longstanding conflicts into the open, revealing deep-seated structural, political, and economic challenges that America must confront. The nation stands at a critical juncture—decisions made now could shape its future trajectory. The new administration may find itself faced with both revolutionary opportunities and severe challenges as these cycles reach their peak.

The October 2 solar eclipse also plays a powerful role in this unfolding narrative, influencing the "hidden forces" of U.S. leadership. This eclipse occurred in the 12th house of the U.S. independence chart and formed a square aspect to the nation's natal Sun—a significant alignment in mundane astrology that speaks to national identity, leadership, and the shadow forces within (Figure 4).

With this configuration, themes of secrecy, hidden adversaries, scandals, and revelations are likely to emerge, along with unexpected shifts in leadership and political intrigue. Espionage, reckonings, and power struggles may surface, creating tension between America's public identity and the unseen forces that have operated behind the scenes. This eclipse's influence highlights the clash between the nation's ideals and the shadowy elements within its structures, suggesting a time of reckoning and potential transformation for the country's leadership and identity.

3.1 The Polls

If you're hearing claims of a Harris win or a landslide shift in momentum, it's worth comparing this with what the latest polls are actually showing. Major pollsters aren't reflecting this supposed momentum (Figures 5-7). According to Rasmussen, Trump remains strong in the key states he needs to secure a victory, while Harris is losing momentum in Pennsylvania and Wisconsin—two critical battlegrounds. Trafalgar and AtlasIntel, both highly accurate pollsters, are also showing that Harris is losing steam, with their data not supporting the mainstream media narrative of a Harris victory.

Election betting markets further echo these poll findings. With just three days before Election Day, PredictIt shows Trump with a 61.1% chance of winning, compared to Harris's 38.9%—closely aligned with my own prediction of 65% for Trump. The swing state odds also favor Trump, adding to the pressure on the Harris campaign, which needs all three of the traditionally blue-wall states. This is contributing to what appears to be a growing sense of panic within the Harris campaign.

In addition, the Mars-Pluto opposition, a significant astrological alignment, has been coming into alignment as the campaign heats up with strong attacks on Trump. Yet despite this intensified criticism, Trump's momentum seems only to be building.

Recently, Harris compared Trump's leadership style to Adolf Hitler's, a move Republican pollster Frank Luntz noted might have stalled her momentum, suggesting that these personal attacks may not be resonating with swing voters.

Trump's position appears to be strengthening, with recent polls showing him leading or tied in key states like Arizona, Georgia, Nevada, North Carolina, and Pennsylvania.

Mars-Pluto's influence could mean even more intense rhetoric as Election Day approaches, especially as CNN's senior data reporter Harry Enten recently commented that there are "clear signs" of a potential Trump victory. Notably, only 28% of Americans currently feel the country is heading in the right direction—a statistic historically correlated with incumbent party losses.

Google Trends data also shows Trump on the rise in search interest across the United States, suggesting heightened public attention as he gains traction in key areas. These combined trends hint at a campaign that may be turning in Trump's favor despite competing media narratives.

4.1 The Astrology

This uptick in Trump's momentum is exactly what we had predicted in our recent horary, showing his chances of winning at 65% (Figure 8).

Further Astrological insights confirm these chances. Looking at her career Blackbox, you can see that Kamala Harris's campaign momentum seems to have peaked around the time of the debate, but her trajectory has since shifted downward in what appears to be a long-term decline. Although she may see a short-lived surge leading up to Election Day (Figure 9), her overall trend suggests she's reaching a low point when it matters most (Figure 10), putting her campaign in a vulnerable position.

Kamala’s Career Blackbox

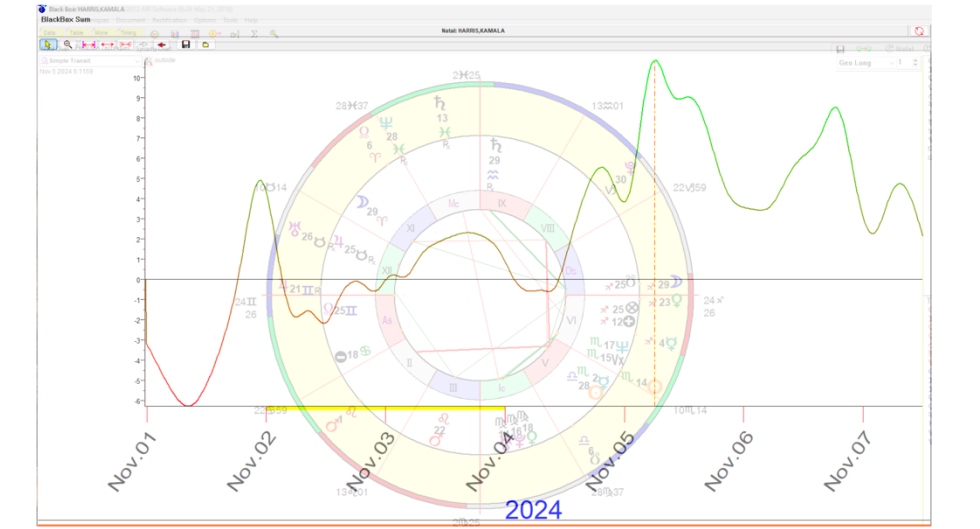

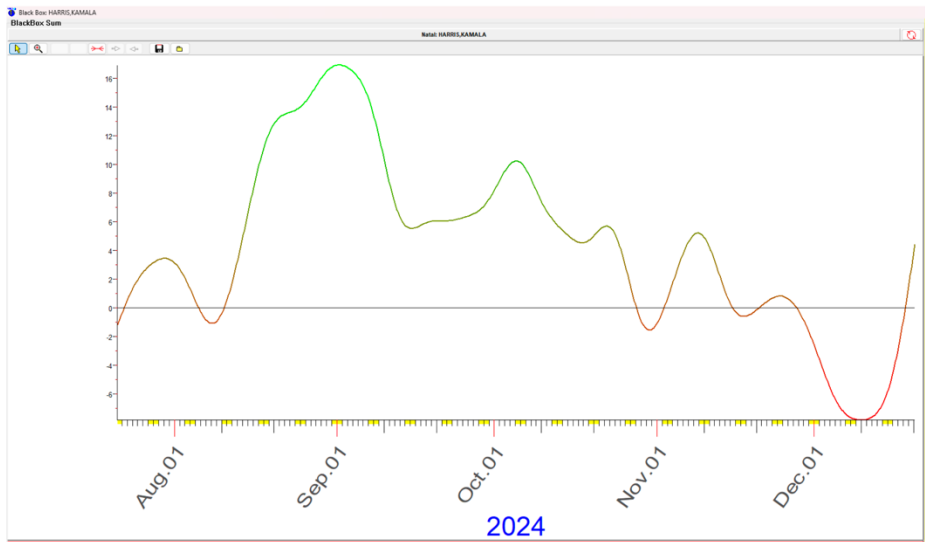

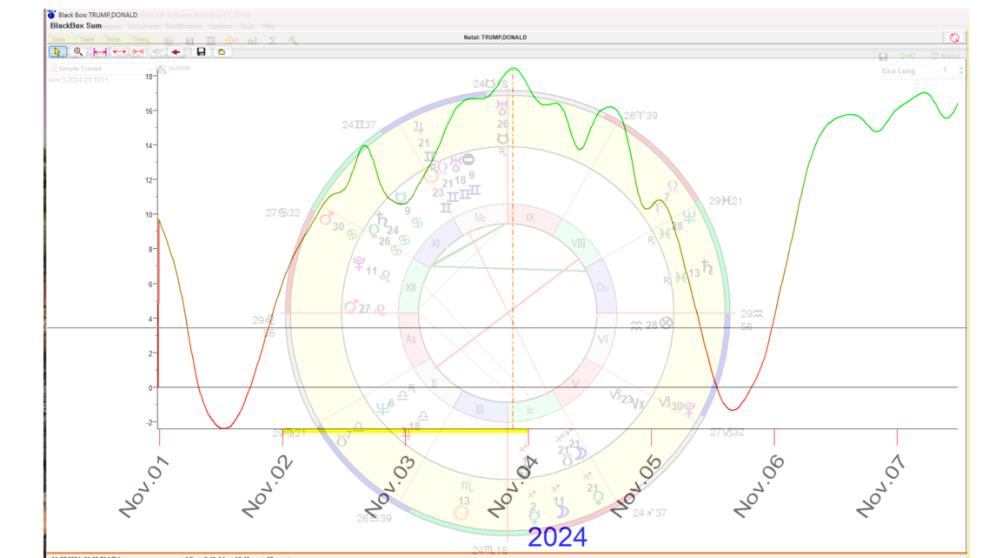

Fig. 10

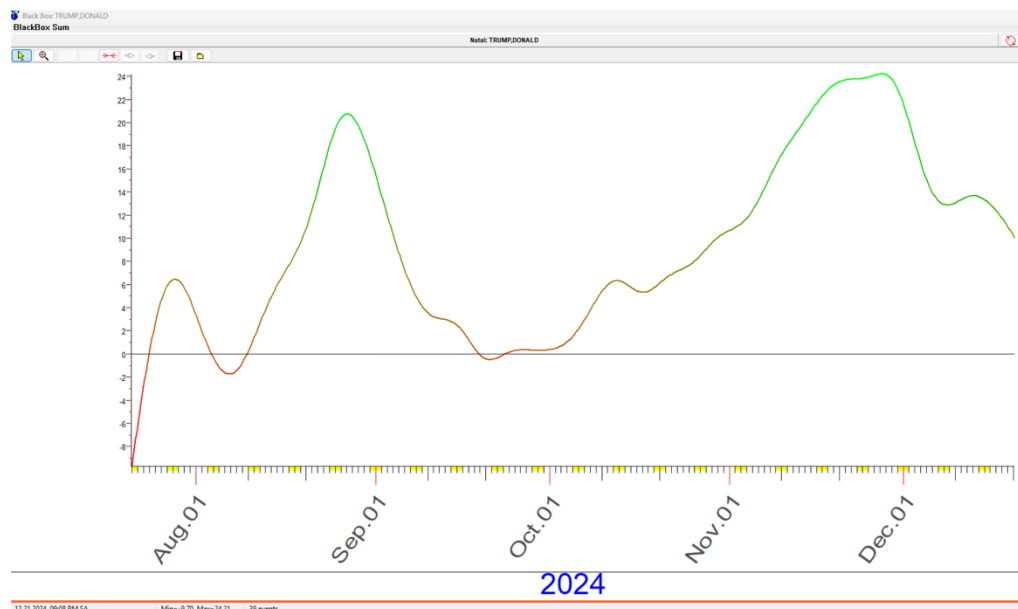

In contrast, Donald Trump’s Blackbox is showing a strong double uptrend around November 4th (Figure 11).

Trump's Career Blackbox

Typically, voters finalize their decisions over the weekend just before Election Day, with most minds made up by Sunday evening. Trump's trajectory indicates a peak on Monday, followed by a potential further boost as votes begin to be counted, positioning him well for a final surge (Figure 12).

Nevada is emerging as a significant bellwether state in this election, much like Ohio has been in past cycles. While Ohio remains reliably red, Nevada—though traditionally more variable—is now showing signs of trending red too. Astrological alignments support this trend, with transiting Uranus on Nevada’s descendant, opposing the Moon, and Jupiter aligning with Nevada’s Mars (Figure 13). These placements suggest a heightened sense of revolt and dissatisfaction among Nevada’s voters. Unlike California, Nevada’s political leanings appear more reflective of the broader national mood, potentially signaling a shift. Recent voter registration numbers in Nevada bolster this, with Republicans adding 26,484 new registrations, notably outpacing the 16,731 new Democratic registrations.

Simple Transit

Further shaping this period is the influence of the Chinese Year of the Dragon, often associated with unexpected and dramatic shifts. This year already brought significant geopolitical shifts, with the never before seen escalation of tensions between Iran and Israel. Such an intense climate calls to mind past turbulent elections like Bush vs. Gore and Dukakis vs. Bush, where unpredictable events created unprecedented outcomes. As the campaigns reach their final days, this chaotic energy suggests that unexpected developments could still dramatically alter the course of this election.

5.1 Conclusion

The outcome of this election is likely to be decisive and clear earlier than anticipated, despite a tight race. Faster ballot processing in key states, combined with a reduction in mail-in voting compared to 2020, means that results could emerge relatively quickly.

Predictive county-level patterns are also expected to offer early indicators of the likely winner, although congressional races may face delays in final results (Figure 14).

Signs are pointing to a clear Trump victory, reminiscent of past election cycles. According to political commentator John King, “there is a deep, wide, and very aggressive panic in the Democratic Party,” a sentiment that reportedly began moments into the Trump-Biden debate and has continued to intensify.

This concern may extend beyond Election Day, with the potential for continued panic within the party until the election is officially certified by Kamala Harris. The situation recalls the post-2016 environment but may be even more intense this time around. Calls for recounts and challenges could further complicate the process, heightening tensions in a déjà vu scenario of contested election dynamics.
